The Pascal Way by Joy Cowley

"You said that if I walked your path with you I would experience the blossoming of heaven.

I thought that you meant flowers, blooms of celebration strewn along the Hosanna road, or arranged by flickering candles in a church filled with peace, or clustered fragrant in a heart made into permanent summer by prayer, or handed to me by friends who valued flowers as much as I did.

You said that if I walked your path with you

I would discover the sweetness of God and I expected to be given flowers.

But actually you were talking of thorns and a cross on the road to dying and hands and feet pierced by a truth that I did not want to own and a feeling of forsakenness and a letting go and a love so terrible it came like a sword in my struggling heart and finally, nothing but you and I in the silence of the tomb.

You asked me to walk your path with you and yes, you did mean flowers

But not the fragile things of a day.

Something of permanent fragrance and a beauty that can't be measured by a panacea* of small comforts.

You were talking of the tomb transformed, imprisonment into freedom, crosses into wisdom,

suffering into compassion, darkness into light,

You were talking of your presence in a life made large by your journey.

You were talking of resurrections without end."
